

WATERDEEP: DRAGON HEIST

FIREBALL

INTRODUCTION

Chapter 3: Fireball is the real 'hook' of Waterdeep: Dragon Heist. It's where the adventure starts in earnest, as an explosion of fire pulls the adventurers from their leisurely lives at Trollskull Manor and right into the middle of a criminal investigation - and a hunt for 500,000 gold dragons!

It's not an entirely flawless ride, however. Because while the fireball will certainly get the party's attention, it's not certain it will actually get them involved. And even if they do, their investigation might still come to a dead end - or a forced and unsatisfactory intervention by the DM. Lastly, the last stand in Gralhund Villa is an exciting and chaotic series of encounters, that can have even experienced DM's reeling.

In this document, we seek to give you resources that'll help make running Chapter 3: Fireball manageable for you - and fun for your players! It's strongly recommended that you read through Chapter 3: Fireball before reading the resources included in this document. And remember: all advice is optional. You know best what works at your table.

The Hook. First, we'll give advice on how to make sure the fireball-incident succeeds in getting the party involved.

The Investigation. Second, we'll go over the investigation itself, identifying problem areas, adding new optional clues and giving advice on how to make sure the party gets where they need to go without clumsy DM intervention.

The Confrontation. Third, we'll take a closer look at Gralhund Villa and the series of encounters that play out here, ensuring that you're well prepared to handle the chaos.

DM's Resources. Fourth, you're given a single page of condensed DM's Notes, easy to reference at the table, as well pages of statblocks for each encounter your party is likely to face during the chapter.

THE HOOK

The characters are dragged forcefully out of the downtime in Chapter 2 and into Chapter 3: Fireball, as a fireball explodes in Trollskull Alley. It's a catastrophe certain to make the front pages of Waterdeep's many broadsheets for days to come. It's also meant to be the hook that gets the party involved in the final two chapters of the adventure.

Here we encounter Chapter 3's first and biggest problem. Because while the party might initially get curious - and even examine the crime scene before the Watch arrives - they are quickly and expressly told by the authorities (Sergeant Cromley and Barnibus Blastwind) to stay away. With no expectation of reward and no personal connection to the incident - besides proximity - they might choose to comply.

Some parties will always try to get involved simply because it's what's in front of them. But some parties won't. And that's an awful chance to take with the event that's supposed to hook them into the rest of the adventure. Below we'll look at a handful of different ways to motivate your party to investigate the incident on their own.

BAD FOR BUSINESS

If the characters have renovated Trollskull Tavern and run it as a business, you can use that as a tool of motivation.

After interviewing the characters, sergeant Cromley tells them: "As you can surely understand, you're going to have to keep closed until we find whoever is behind this, or we're sure that you and your customers weren't the intended targets. Don't worry, it shouldn't take more than a month."

This simple quip alone might nudge your party toward investigating on their own, to get their tavern opened faster.

Note - Choosing your Villain

Your choice of villain influences Yalah's motivation - why she betrays Urstul Floxin, and who she's fetching the Stone of Golorr for. If we had to decide based on what's presented in this chapter, the Cassalanter seem the logical villains, since they are the leaders of the cult of Asmodeus, which the Gralhunds are also in.

However, you don't have to choose a villain yet, if you're still in doubt about which one to pick. By the end of Chapter 3 the party still won't know who's behind everything, unless they've somehow gotten Yalah or Hrabbaz to speak (which is unlikely).

We'll go more in depth with the choice of villain in a later product covering Waterdeep: Dragon Heist - Chapter 4.

RENAER NEVEREMBER

The chapter instructs to have Renaer speak with the party at some point during the investigation. But if you need to give the party a little push, you can choose to introduce him early.

Simply have Renaer arrive just a few minutes after Sergeant Cromley and Barnibus Blastwind have finished their interview with the characters: "I heard what happened.. I came as fast as I could. Is everyone alright? What a terrible, terrible tragedy - and the worst thing is, I think I might be to blame once again!" He then tells them the suspicion outlined in the chapter: that one of his father's spies, a gnome named Dalakhar, has been asking questions about him and the party. He thinks the dead gnome might be Dalakhar!

If this isn't enough to get the party interested by, you can have Renaer ask (and even pay) the party to look into it (preferably without speaking with the Watch and making Renaer the main suspect in a murder investigation).

FACTIONS

You can also have a faction ask the party to look into the incident. Below are mission statements from factions that have reason to want their own investigation:

Bregan D'aerthe. Jarlaxle tells a member of Bregan D'aerthe: "A citywide search for suspicious individuals could put unwanted - and unwarranted - attention on us. Better that the real culprit is found fast, yes?"

Force Grey/Gray Hands. Vajra Safahr tells a member of the Gray Hands: "It's not that I don't trust the Watch - I do! - but sometimes bureaucracy slows things down. I'd like you to find out what happened and resolve the matter quickly. I'm stepping on some prickly toes asking you to do this, so it has to be done unofficially and off-the-books."

Zhentarim. Davil Starsong tells a member of the Zhentarim: "With dead zhents - not ours, mind you - in the middle of this, it's bad for both the city and our business. We need this resolved before the Watch comes around here asking questions. You think you can handle that?"

Harpers. Mirt tells a member of the Harpers: "The Watch are more likely to arrest the corpses for littering, than catching whoever's behind this debacle. We want you to see if you can't give them a helping hand, and get to the bottom of who's behind this disaster."

THE INVESTIGATION

If the characters get the right clues, their investigation should take them from Trollskull Alley to the House of Inspired Hands and then end at the Gralhund Villa. However, work can be done to strengthen the clues leading from one place of interest to the next. While you can always have an NPC or faction hand clues to the party, the investigation will feel more rewarding if the players have a chance on their own.

Below we'll go over some of the clues presented in the chapter, as well as present ideas for adding additional clues.

SPEAKING WITH WITNESSES

There's three witnesses with useful information. Jezrynn Hornraven saw the nimblewright throwing the bead that caused the fireball, Fala Lefaliir can tell the party that a cloaked man survived and took something from the dead gnome, and Martem Trec has found the necklace of fireballs the nimblewright used.

Speaking to Jezrynn. Of all three victims, only Jezrynn's story is going to point the characters to the House of Inspired Hands. Therefore, it's a good idea to highlight her as a witness. As the party arrive on the scene, make sure to describe the middle-aged woman, a noble by the looks of her expensive (but soot-stained) dress, who sits pale-faced on the street not far from the carnage. When a friendly character approaches, Jezrynn is easily coaxed with kind words and a sip of water to give her account of 'a puppet without strings' hurling something into the crowd.

Speaking to Fala Lefaliir. Fala has some pretty important news: someone took something from the gnome and escaped. This clue tells the party two things. First, that the gnome was the likely target of the blast, and second, that something was stolen. It's not pivotal, but it's a good clue for the party to have. Since Fala was upstairs in their shop when the explosion happened, they can come down at any time in the minutes after the explosion to exclaim that: "He ran away! I saw him!" before giving their account of 'a cloaked man' taking something from the gnome and 'limping away' towards the exit by the Bent Nail, while 'looking over his shoulder' as if afraid of being followed.

Speaking to Martem Trec. To introduce Martem, you can have the two most perceptive characters roll a DC 10 Perception while at the crime scene. If successful, a character notices the boy trying to hide something under his shirt, as he stares wide-eyed at the charred corpses. If a character confronts Martem, he gives his account of how the necklace of fireballs plopped into the rainbarrel after the blast.

Optional Clue: Gond's Symbol. If a character searches the roof of Corellon's Crown, from where the nimblewright threw the bead, have them make a DC 10 Investigation or Perception check. On a success, they find a piece of cloth (from a cloak the nimblewright stole from the House of Inspired Hands) with a symbol on it: a toothed cog with four spokes. A character who's been in contact with Gond's temple or who succeeds on a DC 10 Religion check, recognizes it as Gond's holy symbol. If the party doesn't think to do this on their own, you can have Martem point towards the roof of Corellon's Crown and say: "It must've come from up there!", when the party asks him about the necklace of fireballs.

SPEAKING WITH THE VICTIMS

If the characters use speak with dead to interrogate Dalakhar and the two zhents, they'll be able to learn Dalakhar's identity and intentions, as well as the name of the zhent's leader (Urstul Floxin) and their base (Gralhund Villa).

Optional Clue: Wooden Man. None of the victims' answers point to the House of Inspired Hands (indeed, they might actually cause the party to instead head straight for Gralhund Villa!). However, if your party didn't learn about the nimblewright from the witnesses, you can have any one of the dead victims answer that "a weird, wooden man" threw something at them, if the party asks who caused the fireball.

GETTING TO GOND'S TEMPLE

Now, just because the players have found out that the culprit is a magical construct, it doesn't necessarily mean they will head straight toward the House of Inspired Hands. In the book, we're told that a character local to Waterdeep realizes that they've seen similar creatures to the nimblewright during the annual Day of Wonders parade arranged by the House of Inspired Hands. This is obviously effective, as far as advancing the plot goes, but can also feel just a bit too easy.

Here are five different ways the party might realize where to go, without it feeling undeserved:

History. A character native to Waterdeep remembers seeing constructs in the Day of Wonders parade arranged by Gond's priests with a DC 10 Intelligence (History) check.

Religion. A character proficient in Religion knows that Gond is the deity associated with the invention of magical constructs with a DC 10 Intelligence (Religion) check.

The Symbol. If the characters searched the roof of Corellon's Crown and found the piece of cloak with Gond's symbol, this can also help point them to Gond's Temple.

Day of Wonders. If you haven't yet finished running chapter 2, you can describe the Day of Wonders parade happening during the downtime. Of course, this is only an option if the downtime occurs during autumn - or if you move the date.

Helping Hand. If everything else fails, the characters can ask any of the knowledgeable NPCs they know - Volo, Jarlaxle, Vajra, Mirt, etc. - and they'll be pointed to the temple.

NIM'S SECRET

Moving on with the investigation, the party find themselves at the House of Inspired Hands. It's here they meet Nim, who explains through sign language that it has created another nimblewright - which has since escaped. It's also here the party are supposed to find the Nimblewright Detector, which will lead them to Gralhund Villa. There's three things to note:

The Right Nimblewright. The chapter assumes that the characters know that Nim is not the nimblewright they're looking for, but doesn't explain why. To avoid the party getting it into their heads that Nim is the culprit, make sure Valetta explains that it isn't possible, because Nim is bound to the temple grounds by a powerful enchantment. This would also explain why Nim never used the Nimblewright Detector.

Finding the Nimblewright Detector. The characters only find the Nimblewright Detector if they think to search Nim's room. To ensure that they don't miss the main thing that'll get them towards Gralhund Villa, you can have Nim present it to the party, along with a plea that they return the other nimblewright unharmed. This is in contrast to Valetta's wishes, so she refuses to translate it to the characters, which could lead to a fun little debate in agitated sign language.

Using the Nimblewright Detector. The campaign book does not specify exactly how long a search takes, but only says it could take days. If we look at older maps of Waterdeep, the city is roughly 8 square miles all told. Since the detector finds nimblewrights within 500 feet, they just have to get reasonably close to find it. If you have the party tell you, in order, which wards they comb through, counting a half day spent per ward seems about right.

THE CONFRONTATION

Gralhund Villa is the 'dungeon' of Chapter 3, so to speak. It's where the party will finally get dirt on their hands and blood on their blades - if they decide to, that is.

SHOULD THEY OR SHOULDN'T THEY

Immediately at the onset of this part of the chapter, the party is presented with a dilemma: go to the Watch or take matters into their own hands. Depending on your party, their affiliations and their motivation for being involved, they might do one or the other. However, it does feel it would be a shame if the party simply leaves everything to the Watch.

If you want to nudge the party toward going in themselves, you can give the following description as they arrive at Gralhund Villa (assuming they were lead there by the Nimblewright Detector):

You stand before a sprawling villa, enclosed by 12-foot-high stone walls. Through the bars of a huge and ornate iron door, you see a yard with huge trees and two footpaths that lead to a two-story brick building.

And then adding, to the most perceptive characters:

You suddenly realize that you can faintly hear the sound of metal clinking on metal coming from within the estate.

Giving this prompt might make your characters decide to investigate for themselves, instead of heading for the Watch.

ENCOUNTERS IN THE VILLA

First, a quick overview of what the party might encounter:

- G2. Hurv Taldred (cult fanatic) and two mastiffs, or three shadows if the party approaches during the night.
- G8. Two zhent thugs guarding the stairs to G13.
- G12. Three spectres attack if Yalah's book is opened.
- G13. Four veteran guards battle three zhent thugs.
- G15. Urstul Floxin is trying to get to Orond Gralhund.
- G16. Yalah Gralhund and Hrabbaz have just sent the nimblewright away with the Stone of Golorr.

Depending on how the party handles the situation in Gralhund Villa, and which encounters they manage to bypass, they might have a very easy time or a very tough time. Below is some advice on how to balance things on the fly.

G13. Upstairs Foyer. When the characters arrive at the upstairs foyer, they find four wounded veterans facing three wounded thugs. This is a lopsided encounter that leaves at least three veterans alive. The veterans helps the party deal with Urstul Floxin (making it a trivial encounter), but in the end Yalah might have the veterans aid Hrabbaz against the party (in turn making this a very deadly encounter). If you want to minimize the veterans' impact on both possible encounters, you can flip the script and have four thugs facing off against two veterans when the party arrive at G13.

G15. Guest Suite. Urstul Floxin is already damaged and has no poison on his weapons, reducing his challenge rating to 3. This is probably a good thing, but it does make him very unimposing. You can compensate a little by at least making him smart. Just as the party arrive at the guest suite, he manages to kick down the door to G15B, and goes straight to his flying snakes, unleashing them on the party. Having allies attacking the party allows the Zhentarim assassin to deal sneak attack damage on one attack each turn.

G16. Master Bedroom. The half-orc Hrabbaz is an absolute beast, with more than a 100 hit points and the potential to deal upwards of 40 damage each turn, as well as the ability to reroll failed saving throws twice. If the characters get into a fight with Hrabbaz and are losing badly, you can have the Watch arrive just in time to save their lives (alerted by witnesses seeing the party go in, escaped servants or simply the noise of the battle). On the other hand, if the characters are having a too easy time at it, you can have Hurv Taldred arrive with his two mastiffs during the battle, assuming the party haven't already dealt with him.

DEALING WITH YALAH

The situation on the top floor of Gralhund Villa is interesting - but also very chaotic. You have Urstul Floxin and his thugs fighting Gralhund veterans while trying to capture Orond Gralhund, so they can pressure Yalah Gralhund and Hrabbaz to give up the Stone of Golor. Before running this part, it's a good idea to give some thought to what happens, when Urstul Floxin is dead or has fled the scene and the party find themselves alone with the Gralhunds, their bodyguard and any surviving house guards. Here are some suggestions:

Thank Tymora you're here! If Yalah thinks she can make it look like the Zhents are the sole culprits, if she knows the Watch is on the way, and/or if she doesn't have the numbers to confidently fight the party, she'll simply thank them for coming to her aid and offer the same explanation she would've given the City Watch. She'll feign complete ignorance if asked about the nimblewright.

Kill them! If Yalah feels the party knows too much (she's heard Orond spill the beans about everything, or the characters ask uncomfortable questions) and no great noise has been made (such as with the thunderwave spell), Yalah shrewdly asks the party if they've alerted the City Watch. If they say no, and she still has some guards left, Yalah will give the deadly order ("Kill them!"), preferring to leave no witnesses with accounts that conflict with her own.

I'll never tell! Under no circumstances will Yalah divulge who she's really working for or where the nimblewright has gone. If the characters resort to threats of torture or violence against her children, she'll protest loudly ("Assaulting a noble woman in her own home? You'll hang before sunset! You wouldn't dare!"). If this doesn't dissuade the party, you can have one of the servants from G19 arrive, shouting: "Milady, are you safe? We've send for the Watch - they're on the way!"

A Mutual Understanding. If the party has learned about Yalah's dealings with the zhents, her and her husband's devil worship, or her involvement in the fireball explosion in Trollskull Alley, but Yalah has no hope of defeating them (or has already been defeated herself), she might extend an offer. "Go now, before the Watch get here, and none of us will remember that you were ever here - as long as you do the same." If the party have behaved poorly (hurting servants or the Gralhunds, stealing stuff, etc.), they might be wise to at least consider this offer.
