Pirate Interceptor

Like with most other pirate ships it is very daring to speak of a design as such. Often enough there will not be two matching ships in a crew. With this interceptor things are slightly different. Of course there are still minute differences between the individuals ships, but overall they are all based on the same commercial hull.

These hulls started their live as small aerodynamic fuel transporter used to siphon fuel from the atmosphere of gas giants where larger, non aerodynamic ships couldn't cope. This among other things made the hulls interesting for pirates.

The ships could be bought rather cheap and inconspicuous even in larger numbers and they even came with a bare minimum of cheap and easy to maintain armour. Retrofitted with two outdated Pulse Lasers of a rather antique double barrelled design the hardest part of the refit was upgrading the old rather underpowered drive and power plant.

After the refit the design still retains its ability to collect and refine fuel, which in turn might be a boon for pirates. In addition it can carry some cargo and enter an atmosphere. Thus it is able to double as a light transport.

Considering all this, the interceptor is a design that can be produced even in run rather down shipyards without rousing too much suspicion. And a squad or two of them are more than enough to overpower most merchants that don't travel in armed and escorted convoys.

Still it shows, that this small fighter craft is not a new design at the height of technology. Newer military grade fighters will usually outperform it by leaps and bounds.
