JERRY OHMSDALE

"Popcorn, the movie theatre kind," Jenny said, smacking her lips while relishing the memory of the buttered snack.

"Ice cream with sprinkles," answered Lisa, the younger of the two, "and chocolate sauce." She was shorter than her sister, and had more freckles. Both wore baggy, gender-neutral clothes and kept their hair short, on the orders of their father.

"Chili-cheese dogs!" came back Jenny's reply, just getting warmed up to the game, "with ketchup and—"

"Shut up, both of you," Jerry growled from the darkness. "There aren't any more chili dogs or ice cream or popcorn any more and the sooner you realize that the better it will be for all three of us. Now hush up and go to sleep, we have to get going early tomorrow. We have a lot of ground to cover before the snow sets in." He heard them sniffle their dissent, but at least they were quiet, allowing him to concentrate on keeping lookout.

"Good night, I love you." He added in a barely audible whisper.

Jerry Ohmsdale was a car salesman in central Pennsylvania before the war, and a darned good one at that. He made a good living and was able to afford almost anything his wife and two daughters wanted. That success, however, was not enough to keep his wife from straying. After fifteen years of marriage, he came home early one day to find her in their bed with the neighbor.

The divorce was messy and the custody battle even nastier, with both parents accusing the other of marital atrocities and neglect. When the dust settled, custody of the girls was awarded to their mother; now living in Chicago. Jerry was awarded a mere two weeks of visitation a year.

Jenny (13) and Lisa (8) were visiting their father when the Chinese destroyed Chicago in the surprise August attack. As society crumbled around them, Jerry found it harder to care for his girls and he decided to get them to the safety of their grandparents in Mississippi, by any means necessary. This last year has created a hardened man, both physically and mentally, as Jerry attempts to get his daughters to the safety of family in the South.
